The Lost World of Sir Arthur Conan Doyle was a fantasy based on an actual place - Mount Roraima, a remote plateau in South America surrounded by formidable cliffs. During the 19th and 20th Centuries, explorers came looking for gold, but instead discovered strange flat-topped mountains and giant waterfalls, among them Angel Falls, the world's highest. The summits of the mountains, isolated by towering cliffs so high that clouds cling to their precipitous walls, kept their secrets a tantalising mystery for a long time; their dramatic isolation caused scientists to suggest they might even harbour prehistoric life suspended in time. When the summit of Roraima was finally conquered in 1884, explorers found a wonderland of plants and animals new to science living in an alien world of rocks eroded into bizarre shapes. Adrian Warren has made many expeditions to these extraordinary mountains, exploring by parachute and rope, by canoe and on foot, to make new discoveries and bring us this stunning photographic record of his journeys.
